

Germany vs England – the Superleague way!

This weekend sees the next chapter being played out of the increasingly popular Superleague Formula series, with the fifth round taking place at the Nurburgring, in Germany. Home to the legendary Nordschleife circuit, the Eiffel Mountains simply ooze motorsport history and it's another boost for the championship to be returning to such hallowed ground, having last been there in 2008, during the debut season for Superleague.

Despite a mediocre result in Jarama, the championship is still headed by Tottenham Hotspur's Craig Dolby, with AC Milan heading the chasing pack. MCT's glorious-sounding V12 motor will be powering the entire grid and will provide a suitably evocative soundscape to the dramatic rises and falls of the Nurburgring's contemporary circuit.

Superleague has always prided itself on bringing motorsport and football together and this weekend will prove no exception, with Germany and England going to head on Sunday afternoon in the last sixteen of the World Cup. Doubtless, following the end of the racing, German football fans, English race mechanics and Superleague supporters will be watching the outcome of the match together in the Nurburgring 'fahrelager'.

UK followers of the series will be able to watch live coverage of the weekend on ESPN at 10.45 and following that at 13.45, on Sunday. This should be a classic curtain raiser for the England and Germany battle to come later in the day!

While MCT does everything in its power (ahem...) to be absolutely impartial and treats every race team the same, we may not be quite so impartial during the football match...

Ends.
